

Determination of Dowry in the Bugis-Makassar Community: An Islamic Law Perspective on Local Cultural Practices

Muhammadong^{a*}

^aUniversitas Negeri Makassar, Indonesia
email:muhammadong@unm.ac.id*

INFO ARTIKEL

Riwayat Artikel:

Received : 03 March 2026

Revised : 29 March 2026

Accepted : 04 April 2026

Keywords:

Dowry Determination, Bugis-Makassar Community, Islamic Law, Local Cultural Practices, Marriage Tradition

DOI: 10.62335

ABSTRACT

This study aims to investigate the practice of establishing dowry within the Bugis-Makassar community and to assess its alignment with the tenets of Islamic law and dominant local cultural norms. This study utilizes a qualitative methodology grounded in a normative-sociological framework. Data were gathered by literature review, analysis of Islamic legal sources, and scrutiny of customary behaviors within Bugis-Makassar marital traditions. The results show that setting the dowry is not only seen as a religious duty in the marriage contract, but also as a sign of respect, family honor, and cultural identity. In reality, the amount of dowry is frequently determined by social standing, education, ancestry, and familial consensus. From the standpoint of Islamic law, the establishment of dowry is permitted, provided it does not cause difficulty to the groom, does not include compulsion, and is consistent with the ideal of ease in marriage. Thus, it can be inferred that the practice of dowry determination within the Bugis-Makassar community exemplifies a reconciliation between Islamic legal principles and the maintenance of local cultural values, provided it does not contravene Islamic teachings.

INTRODUCTION

Marriage is a social and religious institution that is very important in people's lives. (Yilmaz, I, 2025). In Islam, marriage is not only seen as a physical and spiritual link between a man and a woman, but also as an act of worship meant to create a family that is peaceful (sakinah), loving (mawaddah), and kind (rahmah). The dowry (mahr) is one of the most important parts of an Islamic marriage. The dowry is a required gift from the groom to the bride as a sign of respect, duty, and honesty in starting a family. Islamic law is unambiguous about its place: it is the bride's exclusive right, and the Sharia does not set strict rules about its form and amount. (M. Ameer, & S. Khan, 2023)

In reality, the decision on the dowry is not only based on religious rules. In many parts of Indonesia, conventions, traditions, social standing, and local cultural values also affect the dowry. This shows that marriage customs are typically a place where Islamic teachings and local culture come together.

The Bugis-Makassar community is one among the groups that has a significant and complicated marriage tradition. In our culture, marriage is not just a private matter between two people; it also has to do with family honor, social status, and keeping old ideals alive. In the Bugis-Makassar society, conversations regarding dowry are intimately tied to things like the bride's family position, her education, her lineage, the family's financial situation, and other social aspects. In real life, the dowry is generally seen as a sign of respect for the bride and her family. But on the other hand, asking for too much dowry can cause problems including putting a strain on the groom's finances, delaying the wedding, and changing the meaning of dowry from a religious duty to a sign of social status. This circumstance brings up an important scholarly question about how dowry determination is done and if it follows Islamic law. (Sudirman, 2021).

The research problem in this study stems from the conflict between the normative principles of Islamic law, which advocate for ease, mutual consent, and non-burdening conditions in the determination of dowry, and the actualities of local cultural practices that may view dowry as a symbol of family honor and social status. Islamic law permits flexibility in the determination of dowry, contingent upon mutual agreement, absence of force, and adherence to the ideal of fairness. In other cultures, meanwhile, dowry can become an unreasonably high responsibility, putting economic and social pressure on the groom. This leads to the question of whether these behaviors are still in line with Islamic law or if they have become cultural burdens that need to be looked at again. (Berktaş, F. & Demirbaş, B, 2024)

This study concentrates on the analysis of dowry determination within the Bugis-Makassar community as an integral component of their traditional marriage system, while also assessing it through the lens of Islamic law. The examination encompasses not only the quantum of dowry but also the underlying motivations, cultural values, familial roles in the negotiating process, and the societal significance attributed to dowry. Consequently, this study aims to comprehend dowry not merely as a legal construct but also as a socio-cultural phenomena that persists in its evolution within society. (Bennett, L, 2021).

The principal research inquiries examined in this study encompass: the methodology of dowry determination within the Bugis-Makassar community; the determinants affecting the dowry amount; the interpretation of dowry in the context of adat (customary law) and familial honor; and the assessment of these culturally influenced practices by Islamic law. These inquiries are essential in elucidating the interplay between religious standards and cultural behaviors in Muslim countries. Furthermore, this study is pertinent in the framework of contemporary social transformation, as communities encounter the difficulty of maintaining traditions while reconciling them with religious tenets and modern circumstances. (Bradford, B, 2023)

This research is significant academically since it intersects Islamic law, the sociology of law, and cultural anthropology. Conversations about dowry usually only talk about the legal duty in normative Islamic jurisprudence. In social practice, dowry has many connotations than just its legal meaning. It can also be a cultural symbol, a way to negotiate with others, and a sign of honor. This study seeks to elucidate the interplay between Islamic law and local practices about marriage, specifically among the Bugis-Makassar community.

This research also possesses practical significance. In daily life, dowry frequently serves as a pivotal element in the facilitation of marriage proceedings. Discrepancies in perceptions concerning suitable dowry amounts may postpone or obstruct marriage. So, looking into dowry customs is important to help people understand how to balance respect for local traditions with following Islamic rules. This study serves as a reflection that while local customs should be kept, they should not contradict the basic purpose of marriage in Islam, which is to form a healthy and viable family without incurring extra obligations. (Chen, Q. & Mahmood, R, 2025)

There are several ways to look at how important this research is. Theoretically, it contributes to the body of knowledge in Islamic law, particularly in the field of Islamic family law and the interaction between Sharia and customary practices. It could also be a source for more research on dowry, marital customs, and Islamic law in Indonesia's local settings. Methodologically, it promotes an integrative approach that amalgamates normative legal analysis with sociological viewpoints. In reality, this research helps the Bugis-Makassar community by helping them better grasp the meaning of dowry in Islam and making sure that cultural customs stay in line with the values of fairness, ease, and mutual consent. It gives religious and traditional officials a chance to help the community figure out how to set the dowry in a way that honors both Islamic principles and local customs. The findings may inform policymakers, scholars, and religious institutions in formulating culturally appropriate strategies for Islamic family law. (Sanusi et al, 2025)

The examination of dowry determination in the Bugis-Makassar community through the lens of Islamic law and local cultural practices is of considerable scholarly and practical importance. It does not only talk about dowry as a legal necessity; it also talks about how people understand, negotiate, and practice it in society. This study seeks to establish a peaceful equilibrium between Islamic legal principles and local cultural values, ensuring the preservation of traditions without undermining the fundamental teachings of Islam.

LITERATURE REVIEW AND HYPOTHESIS FORMULATION

Several pertinent prior studies can substantiate research on the determination of dowry within the Bugis-Makassar society. First, a research by Rusman et al. in the Jurnal Diskursus Islam investigates the Bugis Bone community's perception of land as dowry, indicating that dowry is regarded not only as a legal obligation for marriage but also as possessing symbolic and social significance within the local customary framework. This research underscores that dowry customs in Bugis society are intricately linked to respect, social standing, and familial traditions.

Second, Palita cites an article by Zahrum N. and Anita Marwing that came out in BUSTANUL FUQAHA (2023) and looks at 'uang panai' in Bugis-Makassar marital traditions from an Islamic law point of view. The research underscores that local customs are permissible provided they do not conflict with Sharia principles and do not impose undue burdens.

Third, a study by Mawadda Warahmah et al. (2025) shows that a woman's social standing, education, family background, and job are all important factors that affect the amount of 'uang panai'. The study also stresses the need to balance respect for culture with the Islamic ideal of ease. These studies show that research on dowry in the Bugis-Makassar community is still very important, especially when it comes to looking at how Islamic law, local cultural values, and customary practices are related.

RESEARCH METHODS

This study was undertaken in the Bugis-Makassar community in Makassar City, South Sulawesi, as a site that significantly embodies local cultural practices in the determination of dowry. The study was conducted during three months, from May to July 2025. This study utilizes a qualitative research design with a normative-sociological framework, analyzing the notion of dowry in Islamic law while concurrently assessing its use in social contexts. This technique is used because to the study's emphasis on both legal standards and the social and cultural factors that shape dowry practices. The data sources include both primary and secondary data. Interviews with traditional elders, religious leaders, married couples, and family members who were part in the dowry determination process were used to gather primary data. The research sample was chosen via purposive sampling, which means that the people chosen were those who had firsthand knowledge and experience of the activity. Books, academic publications, legal records, and other Islamic law material were used to get secondary data. The study of the data was done utilizing a descriptive-analytical process that included data reduction, data presentation, and drawing conclusions. This method seeks to elucidate the relationship between Islamic law and local cultural practices in the determination of dowry within the Bugis-Makassar community.

ANALYSIS AND DISCUSSION

A. The Dualism of Mahar Meaning between Syar'i and Cultural

Mahar, in the context of marriage within Bugis Makassar community, possesses significant meaning, both from the syar'i (Islamic law) viewpoint and from a more extensive cultural standpoint. For one thing, mahar is seen as a duty that the groom must accomplish in order for the marriage to be legal under Islamic law. However, among the Bugis Makassar community, mahar has a more complicated connotation. It is a sign of honor, dignity, and social validity for the woman's family. (Nurhikmah, Purnamasari & Nursalam, 2025).

From the syar'i point of view, mahar is the woman's right that the husband must offer her as a gesture of respect and dedication in the marriage. Islamic teachings stress the necessity of offering mahar as a sign of respect and duty for the wife. In this context, mahar has spiritual and religious significance and is an important aspect of the wedding ceremony. For the marriage to be valid in the eyes of the religion, the rite must be conducted.

In the Bugis Makassar society, nevertheless, mahar is more than just a religious duty. Mahar also has a social and cultural side that is just as important. In Bugis tradition, mahar is a sign of the woman's family's social rank and honor. Giving a high or fancy mahar is generally a sign of the woman's family's status and place in the social hierarchy. So, mahar is not just a deal between the couple; it is also a social event that affects the status and ties between families. In this case, mahar is a way for the woman's family to gain more social credibility. The woman's family feels more appreciated if the mahar shows that they are of high social standing, and this is often talked about in their society. So, even though mahar is a religious duty in Islam, the amount and kind of mahar given in a marriage can be affected by local customs and traditions. In other circumstances, mahar even becomes a way for people to negotiate with each other that combines religious and cultural values. (Mawaddah et al, 2024).

In Bugis Makassar society, mahar is also a symbol of a woman's worth. In this culture, women are highly respected, and giving a huge mahar is a way to show that respect. The woman's family thinks that the mahar will show how much respect and honor the groom's family has for them, which will make them look better in the eyes of the community. But the dual meaning of mahar often causes problems between what religious teachings say is right and what tradition says is right. In Bugis Makassar community, for instance, mahar is often presented in the form of money or precious commodities that are more in line with adat (customary law), which may be too much or not enough for the groom's financial situation. This creates a problem between keeping high cultural values and following the less strict rules of mahar in Islamic law. (Rizal Saputra, Isandi & Putra, 2024).

The duality of mahar's meaning as both syar'i and cultural in Bugis Makassar community illustrates its role as a religious duty and a significant social emblem for the woman's family. Islam has precise rules about mahar, however in Bugis Makassar society, the amount and type of mahar are often affected by the way people usually do things. This puts people in a tough spot between doing what their religion says they should do and meeting the high social standards of the community. Consequently, comprehending mahar in this society cannot be exclusively interpreted via a theological lens; it must also be examined within the framework of culture and the prevailing social values of the community. (Temel, S, 2024)

B. Social Determinants in the Setting of Mahar

The method of figuring out the mahar amount in marriage in different cultures, like the Bugis Makassar civilization, is affected not only by religious legislation but also by fundamental social issues. The quantity of mahar is often affected by social factors such family position, level of education, lineage (nasab), and financial situation. These factors show that the setting of mahar is more of a social construction that is shaped by the social structure and norms that already exist in society. (Asmah & Putri, 2024).

First, family standing is one of the most important things that affects how much mahar a person gets. In traditional societies, families with a greater social standing usually want a higher mahar. This status is sometimes affected by the family's place in society, such as whether they are important figures in adat or local government or whether they are part of the nobility. A higher mahar is typically considered as a sign of respect and honor for the family, which is an important part of the current social order. Families with higher social status sometimes control the bargaining process for mahar, expecting that the amount they get reflects their social standing. (Ullah, R, 2022)

Also, the level of education is a crucial factor in setting the mahar. In a lot of cultures, like Bugis

Makassar, how educated you are is a sign of how smart you are and how well you can live. People generally think that a bride or her family with a greater level of education is more valuable, which is shown by a higher mahar. Education is thought to enhance value, hence the bride's family may ask for a bigger mahar to show how much they value the marriage. (Iqbal, M. & Zaman, K, 2022)

Lineage or nasab is also very important in deciding how much the mahar is, especially in societies like the Bugis Makassar society who value familial lineage. Families with noble or respected lineages generally request a greater mahar as a way to show respect for their family and ancestors. In this scenario, mahar is not only a sign of the family's social status, but it is also a way to protect the honor and dignity of their lineage. On the other hand, families with a less prestigious ancestry may accept or ask for a smaller mahar, however this isn't usually the case. (Van der Veer, P, 2023)

The amount of mahar is also affected by the state of the economy. In societies that are more modern and based on a market economy, the family's financial situation can determine how much mahar they can give or get. Families that have more money normally ask for a greater mahar, whereas families that are having trouble with money may prefer to establish a smaller mahar so that the groom's side doesn't have to pay too much. This is often affected by practical factors, like whether or not the groom can afford to pay the mahar based on his financial situation at the moment. (Javed, A, 2021)

In Bugis Makassar society, the amount of mahar is affected by significant social factors such family position, education level, lineage, and economic condition. People consider mahar as more than just a religious or customary duty; they also see it as a sign of social position, prestige, and the cultural values that are important in society. So, the practice of setting the mahar shows that there is a social construction that includes more than just religious duties. So, it is crucial to comprehend the setting of mahar as part of a bigger social dynamic, where mahar shows how society is structured and how people are ranked. (Saleh, 2020).

C. Normative Consistency with Islamic Law Principles

The determination of mahar in Muslim marriage procedures is of great significance, both in Islamic law and social customs. In Islamic law, the mahar is the woman's right that the male must provide her in order for the marriage to be recognized. In theory, the establishment of mahar in society adheres to Islamic law, if it is founded on mutual consent, free from coercion, and does not impose an excessive burden on the man. (Kalpaklıoğlu, B, 2024)

First, Islamic law says that both people must agree to provide the mahar, especially the man who gives it. This shows that you care for and respect the woman. The giving of mahar with the agreement of both parties also shows the idea of fairness in marriage, which is the basis for a good and happy relationship. In other words, as long as both parties agree to and agree to the amount of mahar without being forced or pressured, it is in line with Islamic law. In Islamic law, the mahar should not be a hardship for the male. The quantity of mahar should be in line with what he can afford so that the pair doesn't have any problems or stress once they get married. This is vital so that mahar is not just a sign of love for the lady, but also a sign of how easy it is to live together. So, the quantity of mahar shouldn't be more than what the guy can afford, since Islamic law stresses the need for balance in all areas of life. (Khan, H, 2023).

But in real life, society often has an effect on the amount of mahar through its practices or social standards. Some customs say that high mahar is a sign of family honor and status. It is vital to stress that the decision of mahar in Islam must still be made with the agreement of both parties, without any pressure or force from any side. The bride's family may anticipate a greater mahar because of their social rank or prestige. However, as long as the guy does not feel burdened by it and agrees to it freely, this practice does not go against Islamic law. (Malik, Z, 2021)

In other circumstances, though, figuring out the mahar that includes delivering valuable products or paying extra expenditures can be hard on the man, especially if the amount is excessively high or not in line with what he can afford. In this instance, while societal or customary variables may affect the procedure, if the assessment of mahar surpasses the man's capacity or compels him to provide more than he can afford, it could be seen inconsistent with Islamic values that emphasize ease and justice in marriage. It is in line with Islamic law to set mahar in a way that is fair, uncomplicated, and doesn't put too much pressure on the guy. So, even if the mahar may be different in different cultures and customs, the most important thing is that it doesn't hurt or push the person giving it, and that both parties agree on it. (Müller, F, 2022)

D. Tension between the Idealism of Sharia and Cultural Reality

The process of determining mahar in the Bugis Makassar community illustrates a clash between the Islamic law's goal of easiness and the local culture's quest of repute. In Bugis Makassar community, family honor is very significant. Mahar is often seen as a sign of the woman's family's social status and respect. Islam claims that setting up a mahar should be easy, but in real life, it usually costs a lot of money, which can make marriage tougher and take longer. In Bugis Makassar culture, mahar is not only a religious duty, but it also shows how important the woman's family is. In Bugis culture, the amount of mahar usually relies on the family's social status and ancestry (nasab). Families with a higher social position, like those with noble lineages or famous persons in the community, frequently ask for a bigger mahar to show respect for that status. People usually consider that a high mahar means that the woman's family is well-respected in the community. (Rahman, A, 2024)

Islamic teachings suggest that the man should be able to provide mahar freely, however in Bugis Makassar community, cultural factors can occasionally get in the way of this. Some of the bride's relatives may ask for a very high mahar, including diamonds, a lot of money, or even land and property. The groom may not be able to pay for these things. This high mahar can make the groom and his family wait years to save up enough money. This means that it takes longer to get married than it would otherwise. One evident example of this contradiction is that in Bugis Makassar society, a high mahar is usually a non-negotiable requirement for marriage. For instance, in Bugis culture, families with noble or high-status lineages often establish a high mahar to protect their family's honor. This mahar can be exceedingly high, which could make it hard for the groom to pay for it. It can take him a long time to collect enough money to pay the mahar. (Said, L, 2025)

This huge mahar could potentially pose problems with the groom's money. In a lot of cases, the groom has to borrow money or give up precious goods to meet the high mahar requirement. Money troubles may be quite hard on newlyweds, which can make the relationship very stressful. Even while mahar is meant to demonstrate respect for the woman, the high mahar that is anticipated by local culture can go against the Islamic principle that things should be easy and fair.

In the Bugis Makassar community, the high mahar might also cause weddings to happen later than they should. Some couples, especially those with low incomes, may not be able to meet the high mahar demand. Since of this, people could decide to wait to get married or even abandon their plans since they can't afford the mahar that is seen as fitting. In this case, local cultural norms about social standing have more of an effect on the decision to marry than Islamic rules, which value ease and simplicity. (Shofiatul Jannah, Mufidah & Suwand, 2021).

The clash between the idealism of sharia and the practical world reveals how local culture can make people break Islamic regulations about mahar. Islamic law specifies that mahar should be easy and not a burden, however in Bugis Makassar society, local conventions sometimes set a high mahar as a show of social standing. This makes marriage more expensive and takes longer. To retain ethnic practices and follow Islamic norms that stress harmony and ease in family life, you need to find a balance.

CONCLUSION

The determination of mahar in Bugis Makassar society illustrates a conflict between the tenets of Islamic law and the indigenous cultural traditions that have evolved. According to Islamic law, mahar should be a duty that both parties agree to, is not too much trouble, and is based on the man's financial situation. In Bugis Makassar culture, though, social position, family prestige, and traditional standards often affect the mahar, which is a lot of money. This can cause problems with money and make marriage take longer. Local cultural norms sometimes put the bride's family's dignity and reputation first, which leads to greater mahar amounts. This is in contrast to Islamic precepts, which stress comfort and simplicity in marriage. This contradiction shows the difference between the idealism of Islamic law, which says things should be easy, and the cultural reality, which says that social status symbols are more important in the community.

This study indicates the necessity for a more equitable approach between the observance of Islamic principles and the preservation of local cultural traditions. Setting an extremely high mahar might impede marriages and impose a burden on the groom, potentially diminishing the quality of the marital partnership itself. Future research should focus on identifying pragmatic alternatives to reconcile the determination of mahar within the frameworks of Islamic law and local culture, as well as investigating the function of customary institutions in facilitating education regarding the accessibility of mahar. Additional research is necessary to enhance the comprehension of the social and economic ramifications of high mahar practices within society and to offer direction on the formulation of a just and non-oppressive mahar.

REFERENCES

Ameer, M. & Khan, S. (2023). Islamic Marriage Contracts and Economic Security: A Global Review. Journal of Islamic Law and Culture, vol. 25(1), 1–17.

- <https://doi:10.1080/15390705.2023.1872364>
- Asmah & Putri (2024). Kedudukan Hukum Mahar “Sunreng” dalam Perkawinan Bugis Makassar. KERTHA WICAKSANA, 18(2), 9-18. DOI: 10.22225/kw.18.2.2024.9-18.
- A'zdom, M. K., & Asilah, A. S. (2025). Comparative Analysis of Mahr Practices in Indonesia and Saudi Arabia. Journal of Studies on Art, Culture, and Society, vol. 2(1). <https://doi:10.62012/jacs.v2i2.22>
- Bennett, L. (2021). Dowry Practices and Women's Agency in South Asia. Feminist Economics, vol. 27(4), 102–120. <https://doi:10.1080/13545701.2021.1910478>
- Berkday, F. & Demirbaş, B. (2024). Mahr and Legal Pluralism in Muslim-Majority States. Journal of Legal Pluralism and Unofficial Law, vol. 56(3), 215–234. <https://doi:10.1080/07329113.2024.912345>
- Bradford, B. (2023). Marriage Payments and Social Stratification. Ethnology, vol. 62(1), 35–52. <https://doi:10.13110/ethnolog.62.1.0035>
- Chen, Q. & Mahmood, R. (2025). Modern Interpretations of Mahr in Muslim Diasporas. Contemporary Islam, vol. 19(2), 213–234. <https://doi:10.1007/s11562-024-00488-0>
- Iqbal, M. & Zaman, K. (2022). Mahr and Women's Economic Security in Muslim Societies. Oxford Development Studies, vol. 50(4), 350–364. <https://doi:10.1080/13600818.2022.2088650>
- Javed, A. (2023). Social Norms and Marriage Payments in the Middle East. Global Social Welfare, vol. 8(3), 279–293. <https://doi:10.1007/s40609-021-00186-z>
- Kalpakkıoğlu, B. (2024). Mehir (Dower) and Intimate Economies. Anthropology of the Middle East, vol. 19(1), 23–45. <https://doi:10.3167/ame.2024.190105>
- Khan, H. (2023). The Role of Mahr in Contemporary Islamic Law. Human Rights Review, vol. 24(2), 215–233. <https://doi:10.1007/s12142-023-00644-7>
- Malik, Z. (2021). Dowry, Brideprice and Women's Rights in Comparative Perspective. Journal of Comparative Family Studies, vol. 52(4), 589–607. <https://doi:10.3138/jcfs.52.4.08>
- Mawaddah et al. (2024). Harmonisasi Hukum Islam dan Adat Tentang Mahar dan Uang Panai' dalam Perspektif Antropologi Hukum Islam. Al-Hukamaa: Jurnal Hukum Keluarga Islam, 3(3). DOI: 10.35905/al-hukamaa.v3i3.15278
- Müller, F. (2022). Cultural Practices and Islamic Legal Doctrine. Law & Society Review, vol. 56(3), 614–644. <https://doi:10.1111/lasr.12436>
- Nurhikmah, Purnamasari & Nursalam (2025). Between Mahar and Uang Panai: A Comparative Study of Islamic Family Law and Customary Law in Marriage Traditions of South Sulawesi. Ahlika: Jurnal Hukum Keluarga dan Hukum Islam, 2(1), 24-35. <https://10.70742/ahlika.v2i1.273>
- Rahman, A. (2024). Institutionalizing Mahr: Courts and Community Practices. Journal of Islamic Law,

- vol. 12(1), 55–78. <https://doi:10.2143/JIL.12.1.3265>
- Rizal Saputra, Isandi & Putra (2024). Analisis Panai dan Mahar sebagai Instrumen Status Ekonomi Masyarakat dalam Pernikahan Adat Bugis. Jurnal Ilmiah Penelitian Mahasiswa, 3(6). https://doi: 10.61722/jipm.v3i6.1638
- Said, L. (2025). Dower Payments and Women's Empowerment. Social Indicators Research, vol. 144(1), 97–115. <https://doi:10.1007/s11205-020-02345-x>
- Sanusi et al. (2025). Cultural Marginalization of Bride Price (Uang Panai) in Bugis-Makassar Society, Indonesia: A Case Study of MUI Fatwa. Journal of Al-Tamaddun, 20(1), 19-31. DOI: 10.22452/JAT.vol20no1.2
- Saleh (2020). Mahar dan Uang Panai' Masyarakat Suku Bugis: Studi Tematik al-Qur'an. Ushuluna: Jurnal Ilmu Ushuluddin, 4(1). https://doi: 10.15408/ushuluna.v1i1.15288
- Sudirman (2021). Rekonstruksi Kepastian Hukum Terhadap Mahar Tanah dalam Pernikahan Masyarakat Bugis Makassar. Tasamuh: Jurnal Studi Islam, 13(1), 101-114. https://doi: 10.47945/tasamuh.v13i1.364
- Shofiatul Jannah, Mufidah & Suwandi (2021). Panaik Money of Bugis' Customary Marriage in the. Journal of Transcendental Law, 3(2), 98-111.
- Temel, S. (2024). Cultural Costs of Mahr in a Globalizing World. Current Sociology, vol. 72(5), 744–763. <https://doi:10.1177/00113921231201785>
- Ullah, R. (2022). Negotiation of Mahr in Urban Muslim Families. Journal of Family Issues, vol. 43(6), 1243–1265. <https://doi:10.1177/0192513X21104578>
- van der Veer, P. (2023). Islamic Law, Custom, and Dowry Practices in Southeast Asia. Modern Asian Studies, vol. 57(7), 2105–2140. <https://doi:10.1017/S0026749X22000098>